About the Conference:

Learning organization coined by Peter Senge has become a buzz word. It refers to organizations that facilitate the learning of its members while continuously transforming itself. It refers to an enhanced capacity to learn, adapt and change. It is an ideal towards which organizations want to evolve in order to be able to respond to pressures from the environment. Some define it as the absorptive capacity of organizations. A learning organization exhibits five main characteristics: systems thinking, personal mastery, mental models, a shared vision, and team learning. It is commonly hailed as a prescription for organizational success in a dynamic global economy. Learning organization is both a process and an end. There is a lot of literature in learning organizations on themes like 'learning systems', on the importance of single-loop, double- and triple-loop learning, knowledge management, decision making, reinventing the organizations through interventions, organizational readiness and management of change. Some have proposed that learning organizations are initiated and developed by senior management through a top-down approach while others emphasize a 'bottom-up' or democratic approach to understanding a learning organization. Still there seems to be no consensus on the definition of a learning organization. Most authors assume that any organization that intentionally designs its structure, culture, and strategy to foster learning is a learning organization.

The present conference is aimed at understanding the impact of learning organizations beyond the rhetoric.
